

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

Political of Englishness is the fundamental factor of how Brexit campaign managed to succeed. There are many factors that make Political of Englishness raise inside England political debate, the big factor is because their skeptical view on the term European term and how they lose faith in established politic. This political identity is also hugely influence and exploited by UKIP, Labour, and Conservative Party so they could draw support from British citizens and win over their votes to get seats in parliament.

The difference between European Union policy and UKIP, Labour, and Conservative Party influences the decision of England to leave European Union. Sense of Englishness raise because they feel like policies under European Union don't benefit Britain own people and constantly benefit more immigrants. Membership of the EU has brought the Europeanisation of the UK. And the impact of European integration on UK policy can be seen in many sectors through the sense of Englishness approach. In areas such as social, business, migration and religion British policy has been extensively Europeanised which cause Britain's relationship with the EU difficult to manage. The Europeanisation of the UK has also caused divisions within those three parties and challenge their ideology as English party.

With increasing sense of Englishness inside people who feel detached from the laws in their own country, many also feel disconnected and alienated through a prevailing political system that is viewed as being unresponsive and inherently unjust. From a pessimistic, yet pragmatic perspective the process and passing of Brexit referendum can be observed as a strategy means for each party to pave the way for their triumph by making many points as possible in their manifesto that would play nicely with the sense of Englishness as away taking back control from European Union using Political of Englishness.

In this term paper, the focus of the problem is the process of Political of Englishness influence manifesto in UKIP, Labour, and Conservative Party. The success of Political of Englishness to influence Britain political debate reminds us that when it comes to society, it is fine to hold on to one's identity of who we are as a person or citizen but we should sometimes pause and check whether it is still healthy to avoid prejudice towards other group of people who are different from us or cause problem for minority and make them feel unwelcomed, isolated, or even threatened. In order to be able to live well in society we should discuss with those with different views and ways of life without forcing our own belief and making persistent judgement.
