

CHAPTER 5

CONCLUSION

Peter and his colleagues work at the John Lyons military base in Atchafalaya River, Louisiana. Confederate soldiers then forcibly took him to Clinton to build the railroad. Overwhelmed by homesickness and great concern for his family left behind, he had to face the cruelty of Jim Fassel and his men at work. Peter is always looking for new jobs, and this bothers Jim, who then focuses solely on giving him bad work.

Peter feels compelled to travel to Baton Rouge, the birthplace of the Union that has yet to be altered. Peter fights back with a shovel and manages to riot the place while delivering the bodies of the workers to be buried in a pit. The slaves scatter in search of freedom, but Jim and his men go on the hunt for them. Peter has a headache in his stomach, but this does not make it any easier for him to leave the room. Peter sets out to find the swamp, armed with two ideas. He steals a scrap of cloth behind the white man's house, causing Jim to realize what is going on. He dives into the swamp to be dived by Jim, who is an expert tracker.

Jim and his son went because they needed to see Peter. Not only that but a crocodile pounced, causing Peter to have to wait until his salvation was complete. Peter then succeeded in demolishing the building. While paddling the canoe to the center of the lake, he heard the cannon fire of the Union troops in the center of the lake. Peter rushed back to the mainland and searched for a house that was badly damaged.

Peter tried to take care of a black girl who was currently living in his house. However, Jim's two children had left. Peter fought back and managed to kill them after turning himself in. Peter then returned to the swamp shortly after Jim arrived on the scene. Morning came, and Peter saw Union troops all over the river. As he was about to fall asleep, he was interrupted by Jim singing to him in a low voice. Jim is shot dead by Union troops, who arrive quickly and then escort Peter to their camp. After being eliminated, Peter begins a journey into the unknown after his energy is drained.

After analyzing the data and making the conclusion of this research, the Movie Script by Antonie Fuqua through elaboration between intrinsic and extrinsic, I concluded the main character, Peter has a character Brave, Ambitious, and Smart. The movie script "Emancipation" is set in 1863, after President Abraham Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation. The story revolves around Peter, who is determined to find freedom and reunite with his family. The movie script ends with Peter joining the Union Army after finally being rid of Fassel, who was hunting him for days through the swamp. Peter fought against the Confederate Army and was constantly in the line of fire before the Union. The movie script ends with Union soldiers marching into Captain Lyons' plantation, where Peter, his wife Dodienne, and their children are reunited. The conclusion offers a sliver of hope after the main character's long and difficult journey, highlighting the importance of family and the will to survive in the face of adversity. I did a plot analysis according to the five elements contained in Chapter 2, and the result is that each element contains an act of Racial Discrimination. I suggest that literature students who want to research Racial Discrimination in the movie script can learn more about the concept of Racial Discrimination. Not only discussing about Racial Discrimination but students can also discuss the culture and history. Based on this research, I hope that there will be other researchers who will research the same topic to compete with this research for the development of literature although on a different topic. In addition, I hope this research can contribute to the reader's understanding of the concept of racial discrimination and can be an additional reference for those who are interested in the same topic.